

Call for new board members: Spring 2016

Globalist writers, staff, board members and readers at the 2014 Globie Awards.

The Seattle Globalist is an award-winning nonprofit news and educational organization dedicated to elevating diverse voices through media. We cover local-global issues—everything from immigration and politics to food, music, and the environment.

The Globalist is working to transform the face of media in the US, where people of color, immigrants, women, and many other groups are sorely underrepresented.

We have published stories by more than 500 contributors based in Seattle and all over the world.

We are a young, dynamic organization that is growing fast and part of an ever-shifting shifting media landscape. We are seeking wonderful new people to join our working board. We are deeply committed to racial, ethnic, nationality, gender, religious, disability and other forms of diversity.

Our board meets over dinner every other month on the second Monday of the month. Committees – executive, program, and fundraising – meet during the intervening months. Each board member commits to volunteering 5-10 hours a month, and supports Globalist fundraising work throughout the year. We are proud that 100% of our board makes an annual financial contribution to the organization.

We are currently seeking board candidates with experience in the following fields: journalism, the corporate and tech worlds, finance/accounting, fundraising, youth development and education, and/or web development. All candidates must have a passion for diversity and global issues.

To apply: send a resume and brief intro letter to Executive Director Jessica Partnow, jessica@seattleglobalist.com.
